THE YOUNG THEATREGOER

1 A higher proportion of people go to the theatre than to music concerts or sporting events. And contrary to the common belief the theatre attracts older audiences, the typical theatregoer these days is between 16 and 19 years old.

2 These are the findings of a recent survey into developments in the UK's theatre industry. The survey was commissioned by a ticket sales company after it noticed a trend for more theatre sales to young people. The research confirmed that, far from dying out and being replaced by cinema or online entertainment, the theatre is growing in popularity. In fact, 63% of people said that they had attended a theatre performance in the past year. In comparison, only 53% had been to a music concert, and less than half to a sporting event. And the theatre is most popular among teenagers, with 87% saying they had seen a performance.

3 The appetite for theatre among young people is striking, but what can explain this shift in trends? It seems that many teens are coming to the theatre via participation in drama clubs and acting schools. Others come through their studies, as a rising number of students are studying theatre in higher education. And a further reason may be that the theatre itself has changed beyond all recognition in the past 15 years. While big productions such as The Phantom of the Opera remain popular favourites, most young audiences want to see new shows. The emergence of 'immersive theatre' has played an important part in engaging new audiences.

4 Immersive theatre performances are more likely to be performed outdoors, in the streets, in car parks or warehouses, than in mainstream theatres. And the audience is not merely passive, but it sometimes moves around and explores the performance space while the play is in progress, and may even be invited to play the part of characters in the play.

5 However, it seems that the biggest barrier to attendance at theatres, for all age groups, is cost. Having said that, the report also reveals that two-thirds of people want to maintain or increase their theatregoing in the future. It seems that the theatre has managed to reinvent itself to appeal to modern audiences. This art form, which has been around for thousands of years, seems likely to continue and grow for many years to come.

Reading Two (10 marks)

Read this extract from a travel book and answer the questions accordingly.

1 When I had eaten my sandwich, I returned to the hotel, collected my luggage, and thought: Now what? I went back to Exeter train station and looked at the television screens. I thought about catching a train to Plymouth but the next one wasn't for a couple of hours.

There was, however, a train to Barnstaple leaving soon. I decided to catch that train. From 5 Barnstaple I could catch a bus to Minehead. It seemed a great idea.

I asked the man at the ticket office for a single to Barnstaple. He told me a single was £8.80, but I could buy a return for £4.40. 'Could you explain how the fare for a return is cheaper than for a single?' I asked. I'm sorry but I can't, sir,' he answered honestly.

10 I went to the correct platform and I sat down. The platform televisions weren't working and I couldn't understand the announcements. Every time there was a new arrival, I had to get up and ask which train it was. For the benefit of foreign readers, I should explain that there is a certain ritual at British train stations. Even though you have heard the conductor tell the person in front of you that this is the Barnstaple train, you still have to say:

15 'Excuse me, is this the Barnstaple train?'

When he tells you that the large object next to you is indeed the Barnstaple train, you have to point at it and say: 'This one?'

Then when you board the train, you must additionally ask the people already there: 'Is this the Barnstaple train?'

20 It took over an hour and a half to travel the thirty-eight miles to Barnstaple. When I arrived, I went into the bus station. Two women were sitting in the ticket office. I asked them about buses to Minehead, approximately thirty miles east. They looked at me as if I'd asked for a ticket to Tierra del Fuego. After they had explained that there were no buses to Minehead that afternoon, I thanked them and left. I tried to think what to do next. I went to

25 a hotel and ordered a tuna sandwich and a cup of coffee. While I was eating my sandwich, I took out my timetable and saw that I had twenty-three minutes to eat my sandwich, drink my coffee, and walk back to the railway station to catch a train to Exeter, where I could start again. That was exactly what I did.
